

Description of Experimental Program

Humanoid Labs, Inc. (“Humanoid”) seeks experimental special temporary authority (“STA”) for a period of three months commencing March 1, 2022 to conduct testing of a personal portable transmitting device to be used in tandem with a mobile app. The portable transmitter combines off-the-shelf electronic components in a unique, proprietary configuration to allow users to share data through the app for the purpose of establishing a tailored cosmetics use and preference profile. STA is sought under both Section 5.3(h) of the Commission’s Rules, to test the equipment in advance of seeking regulatory approval under Part 15, and under Section 5.3(k) of the Commission’s Rules, to assist in the product development through a limited market trial that will allow up to 125 beta testers throughout the United States representing a cross-section of potential users to experiment with the device and provide feedback to the company on its functionality. Complete technical parameters for the transmitting components of the device to be tested are provided in the associated FCC STA Form.

Humanoid understands that it is responsible for informing all participants in the STA experimental trial that the operation of the device and associated services is being conducted under an experimental authorization and is strictly temporary. It also understands that it is the owner of all devices in use and is responsible for recovering them from beta users at the end of the trial unless the equipment under test has received an FCC equipment authorization at that time and the equipment is labeled in accordance with such authorization.
